In real life, few mathematical situations can be clearly classified as belonging to one content strand or another, and few situations require only one facet of mathematics thinking. Therefore, many of the questions are classified in a number of ways. In addition to being classified by all applicable content strands, each question was classified by its assessment of applicable mathematical abilities ( procedural knowledge, conceptual understanding, and problem solving ) and mathematical powers ( reasoning, communication, and connections ). As displayed in Figure 1. 1, the content strands, mathematical abilities, and mathematical power combine to form...
