Not illustrated. 1860 Excerpt: . . . ON A LOVELY AUTUMNAL DAY. 1 WEET Day! so cool, so soft, so calm, so bright! N Such Sabbath quietude doth oer thee rest, With soothing balm it penetrates my breast, Imparting its own tranquil, pure delight. Methinks, with thee, from realms of heavenly light Descends some angel-power, some spirit blest, That doth with solemn sanctity invest The earth, tho hid from our weak human sight. Oh! could some seraph-touch from film obscure Our eyelids purge, and to our view reveal What sin and mortal frailty now conceal Of things celestial, that surround us, --sure Our hearts would oftener feel a holy awe, As though, whereer we turned, a visible God we saw. Sigma. George Herbert. LEGENDS OF THE CONTINENT OF AUSTRALIA. No. I. 1 OING out to Australia is, I suppose, about the very latest invention which mankind have devised for the purpose of escaping their destiny. How to do this has been the great life-problem of all ages. Generation has succeeded to generation, empires and faiths have risen, and grown, and culminated, and faded again. Science has gained greater and greater victories over brute matter and the powers of nature, from the time of the fire of Prometheus, down to the days of American clothes pegs. But the grand problem--how to shake off that intangible, inevitable principle, compounded of sin, misfortune, and mere circumstance of evil, voluntary and involuntary, innate and acquired, altogether working with the precision of a natural law, and...
