Excerpt: . tionally, and for the sake of being intelligible. Each term embodies a theory which is hotly debated, but each is fixed in the nomenclature of ethnology, and so will be readily understood. The word Celtic is here used to cover two groups of peoples: first, the Gaels; secondly, the Brythons who came after the Gaels. These peoples had racial and linguistic affinities. As a fact, the Goidels, who entered Britain somewhere between the eighth and the tenth century B.C., and the Brythons, who came from Belgica about the third century B.C., spoke dialects differing from each other as much as Latin differed from Greek or English from German.¹⁵ With respect to the term Aryan and its correlative non-Aryan, the excuse for perpetuation is necessity--tyrant custom has already settled the matter. The late Professor Max Muller, reasoning on the basis of comparative philology, traced...
